EXTRACT. A SONG FOR THE ENGLISH SPEAKING Now, this be your faith, and hold it still. Wherever you see the sun, That all of our race should in heart and will, As in blood and in tongue, be one, ' What matters the sky that's over your head What mutters your clime or place? Whatever the land you may chance to tread You're still of the English race! So this be your faith, and hold it still, Wherever you see the sun, That all of our race, in heart and will, As in blood and tongue, are one, By the Mississippi's mighty floed, . By the Marray's or Ganges' side, That you're English still, in thought and blood Let this be your beast and pride. You're one, by the need you must be free In tongue and in pen and thought: You're one, by the will self-ruled to be With the rights for which Cromwell fought! So this be your faith, and hold it still, Wherever you see the son. That all of our race, in heart and will, As in blood and in tongue, are one. We 'te one, in the pride that lights our eyes, When we utter our Shakapors's name: In our common right in the great and wise

Whose words are our race's fame. Wherever the hand that given to birth One who sings in Milton's tongue. He 's owned by all round the rolling earth By whom Barna's songs are sung! For this is our faith; we hold it still Wherever we see the sun-That all of our race, in heart and will As in blood and in tongue, are one. Shall ever discord between us be? Shall ever a madman dare To urge us to strife! Accurat he he: Let our scorn be that vile one's share! With the years shall our love but stronger grow Through the future, whate'er befail, Shoulder to shoulder we'll onward go For a good to be shared by all! For this is our faith; we hold it still, to light is as nothing. Wherever we see the sun. That all of our race, in heart and will.

The first mummies discovered were those of the Greek epoch, and I thought, in consequence, that the entire necropolis belonged to the period of the Lower Empire. But as the explorations continued, we encountered more and more ancient tombs; one of the sixth dynasty, several of the eighteenth, and even of the to d reign of the Heretic Kings. These latter had been violated from ancient times, and Acce presented the appearance of a charnel-house. The inhabitants of Akhmim, like those of Thehes, made no scruple of dispossessing the mummies, and the extinct families, to gain possession of their tombs. Most of the chambers must have changed masters ten times before receiving their present occupants. To sum up, this was a cemetery of small people (lower classes), well-to-do citizens, priests of an inferior rank, and tradesmen. The beaping up of the bodies, and the small care with which these were treated, would not be easily explained, were it not that contemporary documents furnished with the most precise information as to the manner in which the perservation and worship of the dead were regulated. Only the rich had the privilege of occupying a separate chamber, and of ensuring, by pious foundations, the prayers of a special priest people of fortune, and belonging to the middle-classes, intrusted the mummies of their defunct relatives to undertakers or contractors affiliated with the clergy, who stored the bodies in their premises, and for the payment of an annual rent, or a lump sum, undertook to look after their preservation, and celebrate the canonical ceremonies on the days appointed by the ecclesias cal law. . . . Even the animals had their trypogea, mixed with those of human beings; here are hawks in hundreds in wooden boxes; there we find jackals piled up in holes.
